

Science, the State and the City

Britain's Struggle to Succeed in Biotechnology

Geoffrey Owen, London School of Economics, and Michael M. Hopkins, University of Sussex

- Provides the most recent and detailed history of UK biotech industry, with comparison to the US
- Written in an accessible style for a wide range of readers
- Builds on rigorous analytical work informed by academic theory
- Based on extensive interviews with key industry participants, investors, and policy makers

The story told in this book, based on extensive interviews with industry participants, investors, and policy makers in the UK, Continental Europe, and the US, sheds new light on one of the central issues facing governments in the advanced industrial countries - how to create and sustain new science-based industries.
