Graduate School Managers: Affective Lives in the Neoliberal University

Discussions about the neoliberal university tend to focus on the ascendancy of neoliberal reason, its associated discourses, and the consequences for: government policy; higher education as a sector; and individual higher education institutions. By contrast, there has been little consideration given to everyday affective experiences, especially those of professional services members of staff such as Graduate School Managers.

Based on interviews with eight individuals who had served as Graduate School Managers in eleven different institutions (eight Pre-1992 institutions and three Post-1992 institutions), Paul Roberts will discuss the affective lives of Graduate School Managers in the context of the UK Neoliberal University.
